

Greetings and Salutations coming to you from Accra, Ghana West Africa Friday January 29 in the year of 2016.

Today we started out headed for the oldest indoor mall in Accra, Ghana. It is modern and similar to malls I frequent in the States. It is size-ably smaller than the malls I am use to.

Next we visited the Memorial to Kwame Nkrumah in Accra which is different from the link I posted yesterday which was for the Kwame Nkrumah University.

In the images you can see the primary school kids standing along bigger than life size first president, which is memorial that houses You can also see one display. We had a tour as she explained what declined for me to take was no photography museum section of the

We left there and where I managed to youth as we drove by. I took were not good you but I did manage included in the photo headed across town capture pictures of other So many of the pictures, enough to share with to find a couple which I expose of our day.

We also visited the situated on a cliff aside we too some photos grounds. I'm told it's a to share their artworks.

Akuma Village which is the Atlantic ocean where and walked around the place where artist come Based on the layout it also looks like they have rather large parties there. They have a narrow, winding path that leads you down the hillside to the beach but I did not see anyone on the beach, this day.

To end our day we went to a nice restaurant, spent more money that we had budgeted to spend but had a splendid time meeting up with a third set of Ghanaen referral contacts from the states. I hope to explain more about that at some point but it's late and I really should get started sleeping while it's still night time.

I need to mention that I was just informed that while I was typing in the dark, last night I misspelled the name of the founding director of the Museum, we visited who is retired from teaching Art at the university, his name is Ablade Glover. I would have mis-spelled it again if I was not looking at his 80th Anniversary signed catalog, that he gave me, right now.

Well that's it folks for now. Expect there to be more to come.
